I have a file (let's say it's the master source code) which I edit with Vim. I start vim by typing :e *. At this point, Vim loads the u-diff file and the diff takes a while to complete. Is there a way to tell Vim to not bother loading the u-diff file or for it to check its timestamp and leave if the file is outdated, or at least check every so many seconds? A: I'm not sure if this is what you want to do, but you can add au BufEnter *. * to your ~/.vimrc. This will open a buffer and start diffing when you open a file with "e". A: You could put set nu to some value larger than 0. :set nu 20 :set will show a list of available options. But do they ever get a bad rap? Since the beginning, we've been playing with our intellectual perceptions. In the future, we're going to be about to face up to some of the earliest concepts in video games - violence, war, death, and depravity. Video games were, of course, invented in the 1970s, and it's not hard to find much older video games in serious exhibition or museum collections. Certainly, chess was around in the 12th
